

Uganda in Review

June 2003

Lucky you! You can pretend you're stuck looking at pictures of my trip with me without actually having to be stuck (I like looking at other people's pictures, but I understand not everyone feels the same way as I do). I included narration so you can pretend I'm right there with you.

Some Entebbe scenes... so you have an idea what it looked like... a shopping area called Kitoro, some roads...

This is the office where I worked. Notice Lake Victoria in the background. You can't really see it so well in pictures, but it's a very pretty view we had from our office.

Here is the equipment room (formally a bathroom because it's a good idea to place electrical equipment near water sources... really because there's no other place to put it). You may, in your heart, not be impressed with this picture. It may just look like a bunch of wires to you or you may be thinking that it could've been done so much better. Doesn't matter. Whatever you're thinking in your heart, you'll just have to keep to yourself. You are required to make appropriate "ooh" and "ahh" comments. "Wow, Sheryl, this is truly impressive" --- also appropriate.

At the office during morning devotions (which are followed by tea... I always thought, in places where they had tea, tea happens in the afternoon. What do I know? We had tea at 11am... I decided this was because lunch is at 1pm and people can't make it that long without some kind of sustenance)

This is me on a "boda" (motorcycle), my primary means of transportation in Entebbe. Motorcycles are much fun once you get past the whole danger aspect (and it's not all that dangerous in Entebbe, there's not much traffic and they go relatively slow, plus they'll go slower if you feel they're traveling too fast and ask them nicely to go a teeny bit slower).